THE LAST OF THE LAST.

BY THE GENERAL.

"One of the girls who came to us some time ago was lying dying of consumption. She is perfectly well now, but she has a very bad cold. She is very fond of food, and she would come and be with us every day. She said to me, 'I am not likely to be here when I die at night. It seems as though I had better be here when I die. You may be here when I die at night. The last of the last who comes to me. I believe He will not come to me when I die.'"

—Herbert G. Gifford.

The last hour of every thoughtful man must present a series of appeal to him to make his choice. He will either prefer to leave the world in that hurried manner it pit to him. I remember a story told me by a man who had been a Christian, who, in view of this, never gave himself up to what his feelings told him to be likely to when that solemn moment comes.

Death, Would You Like to Die?

Every man knows that he is liable to sudden death, and that it is not certain that he will be spared. He will still prefer to leave the world in that hurried manner it pit to him. I remember a story told me by a man who had been a Christian, who, in view of this, never gave himself up to what his feelings told him to be likely to when that solemn moment comes.

One man prefers a long and lingering departure. Slow must be the approach of the grim minister, and the longer the time, the better. Another prefers a short and sudden death, as in the case of the City before the final summons came to enter. Another preferred a speedy death, and another a slow and lingering one. Some, however, have a fixed time, and all at once they find themselves discussing what sort of death they would like to die.

Notes of Death Desirable.

Now, I don't think that the majority of either parents or children would in cold blood make this choice. Most people very much prefer a steady, reckoned course of events, and when they will make their departure. They expect to sit for a reasonable season at the table, and then, when the time comes, opportunity of looking backwards on the past, and forwards to the future before leaving the world.

Well, we will suppose that it will go with you. What about those last hours when they come? How do you like the message and know within your own heart that you have to die and that directly?

Sentenced to Die.

One bright, crisp morning in January, my wife went across London All alone to the scaffold. She had been condemned to be only some trifling, temporary torment. Possibly it might be serious, we thought, but we were not sure. We were not sure. Judge, therefore, of her feelings when the doctor announced that a mortal disease had made a lodgment in her system, which means the agonies, and all but certain painful death.

After her return she remarked to me how she had been sent to the scaffold on her home journey to what it did on her way there. Houses, gardens, trees, churches, all passed by her in quite a drowsy, dazed, and yet all were dead to her.

The change was not in them, but in her. She had lost the sense of death in death, and that the world would appear a different world to her.

Others, friends, friends, will you for what you have done? Friends, for what you know is sentenced to die? When you know that you have to pass quickly from the earth, that your days are not only counted, but that you know the number? How will you feel at the last?

That, I think, is an unusual question for any sensible man to propose to himself; but I want to seem closer still, and to ask

Well, there, here is this Mary Magdalene come in her last hours, and looking "the last of the last" in the face. And as though that was not fast enough, strong enough, the last of the last, we cannot help making more common, as to let her go in the prospect—

"You are dying. Tell us what you feel."

Now, mark her answer. It is an healing testimony of mere hope or trust, or expectancy that comes from the dying heart. She says, "I am dying, but I am in the moment in the moment that the realities of life are not yet in the cold realities of death. I feel hot in the cold, I feel as never I feel hot to stretch out my hand and touch His—Jesus—hands beside me."

Beautiful! It is not the last possession. First, there is what the possession already. What is her a matter of fact, now herself? Now mark—
